FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

Sonya Clark: Monumental Cloth, The Flag We Should Know March 29 – August 4, 2019

Philadelphia, PA, February 26, 2019 — The Fabric Workshop and Museum (FWM) is pleased to present Sonya Clark: Monumental Cloth, The Flag We Should Know, on view March 29 through August 4, 2019. The opening reception will be held on Friday, March 29, 2019 from 6:00 to 8:00 pm.

In the spring of 1865, a seemingly unremarkable dishcloth played a crucial role in ending the Civil War. Pressed into service as the South's flag of surrender at Appomattox, this cloth became known as the Confederate Flag of Truce. Over 150 years later, textile and social practice artist Sonya Clark elevates this lesser-known cultural symbol as she challenges the power of propaganda, erasures, and omissions in Monumental Cloth, The Flag We Should Know.

In presenting this exhibition, Sonya Clark questions: "Why do we know the Confederate Battle Flag instead of the Confederate Truce Flag that marked surrender, brokered peace, and was a promise of reconciliation? What would it mean to the psychology of this nation if the Truce Flag replaced the flag associated with hate and white supremacy?" By making the Truce Flag into a monumental alternative to the infamous Confederate Battle Flag and its pervasive divisiveness, Clark instigates a role reversal and aims to correct a historical imbalance.

The exhibition will feature five installations across two floors of gallery space. Monumental is a woven recreation of the Truce Flag measuring ten times its original size at 15 x 30 feet. Many is an adjacent installation of 100 true-to-scale replicas – woven by FWM Studio staff using traditional methods and historically accurate dyes – of the original (in the collection of the Smithsonian Museum of American History). Propaganda, a text installation, will present an exhaustive list of commercially available items featuring the Confederate Battle Flag, including hats, bumper stickers, towels, and bikinis.

Through a duo of participatory installations titled Reconstruction Exercise and Lesson Plan (Confederate Truce Flag), visitors will come to know and understand the Truce Flag by weaving replicas and making rubbings of its texture. Clark will also activate the gallery with a public performance – Reversals – on Saturday, March 30. Using a dishcloth commercially printed with the Battle Flag symbol, the artist will clean a dusty floor to reveal text from the Preamble to the Declaration of Independence. Additional public programs – some organized in collaboration with the African American Museum in Philadelphia, Museum of the American Revolution, and other local institutions – will allow audiences to engage with themes related to the exhibition on a deeper level. In the fall of 2019, FWM will publish an illustrated catalogue for Monumental Cloth, The Flag We Should Know.

The Fabric Workshop and Museum is housed in a former flag factory, a particularly fitting place to ask questions about the symbolic power cloth can hold in the consciousness of our nation. FWM's Executive Director, Susan Lubowsky Talbott, emphasizes the exhibition's importance amidst our current political and cultural climate: "Race is a driving issue in America, particularly at this moment in our history. Sonya Clark's show gets at the core of why the cultural symbols we stand behind matter." Monumental Cloth, The Flag We Should Know is a timely catalyst for dialogue about the scars of the Confederacy and America's ability to acknowledge and reckon with racial injustice.

The exhibition at FWM will coincide with Sonya Clark: Self-Evident, on view at the African American Museum in Philadelphia (May 18 – September 9, 2019).
